Dead Shots In the Night -- By Garrett P. Serviss

A Little Invention of Thrilling Interest To Burglars and Wild Beasts

IN MY youthful days when a farmer stole out on his front porch in his stockings, at dead of night, with his brown barreled fowling piece, made over from a revolutionary musket, to shoot a serenading cat, he got his wife to stand behind him with a candle held over his head to illuminate the gun sights. The cat usually stopped long enough considering the strange spectacle to get the full benefit of the shot.

This primitive method of sighting a gun at night forms the groundwork of an interesting little invention, whose possibilities are illustrated in the accompanying pictures. There is a good deal more of philosophy in this matter.

The Tiger Turns Into a Great Big, Blanking Cat

Hands Up!

Some of the most thrilling stories told by African and Indian hunters for lions and tigers relate to night adventures in the jungle, where the shooter conceals himself on a leafy platform constructed at an elevation above some haunt of wild beasts, where a lure has been placed to attract the night-prowling quarry.

Uncertainty Avoided.

Usually it is necessary to take aim by the uncertain light of the moon, or the dim illumination from the stars, but with a search, or flashlight, sending its ray straight along the track so followed by the hunter, all uncertainty of aim would be avoided, with the added advantage of a sharper definition of the target, and a momentary paralysis of the quarry. In many cases, a wild beast thus surprised by a dash-ter than may appear on the surface. The old farmer had the fundamental idea without having the scientific knowledge or the mechanical ingenuity required to develop it.

His Majesty, the Lion, Gets Both Puzzled and Angry

Interesting Facts.
You will observe that with his little search light, attached to the underside of his rifle, the sportsman in the picture accomplished two things at once. In the first place he illuminates the living target and insures its remaining motionless for a few seconds through the fascinating effect of the light; and, in the second place, he gets his aim simultaneously with the revelation of its object, because the line of projected light is so arranged, parallel with the barrel of the gun, that the bullet is sure to strike within half an inch of the center of the small illuminated area on the target. In the meanwhile the shooter is concealed in relative darkness, behind the dangle of the flashlight.

This is practically what the farmer and his wife accomplished with their candle, for its light revealed the object and directed the aim, while temporarily paralyzing the animal with surprise and curiosity. But, of course, the modern invention is incomparably more effective.

Attached to a revolver this device would, probably, be an invention of the future. The sudden illumination alone would be, in most cases, sufficient, and no actual shooting would be necessary. It would be the burglar who would have to throw up his hands, and if he wasn't quick about it the bullet would follow the light ray.

A Picturesque Sight.
But the most picturesque applications of searchlight shooting must be sought for in the hunting field. All who have been in the Adirondacks and the Maine woods know the astonishing effects produced upon deer, and other animals, by a light carried in the bow of a silently paddled boat, where the hunter, with gun ready poised, sits in the contrasted darkness behind the light and takes his aim at leisure. A narrow beam of light projected in the time of five would better define the mark and, at the same time, insure a more deadly aim.
